STUART VARNEY:

electeds do. Got it, Alexis, thank you very much. Now this, the governor of Kentucky, Andy Beshear, isn't worried about socialism dividing the Democrats. Oh no, watch this.

GOVERNOR ANDY BESHEAR:

I think the Democratic Party has to be a big tent party, where people can have different ideas on how we solve a problem, as long as we agree that that problem exists. I mean, right now, the media is obsessed with differences in the Democratic Party, when the differences between the Democratic Party and the Republican Party are so stark.

STUART VARNEY:

House Majority Whip Tom Emmer joins us this morning. All right, Congressman, do you think the big tent strategy will work for the Democrats, when you pack them all into the tent?

REP. TOM EMMER:

I tell you what, we saw this when Ken Martin, a fellow Minnesotan, was elected to be the chair of the DNC, Stuart, you might remember that. If you would have looked at the picture of him at the podium, the island of misfit toys standing behind him was never going to come together. There is a, I agree with our speaker, Mike Johnson, there is a war going on in my grandfather's Democrat Party right now. And, you know, whether it's the Kentucky governor, or it's David Axelrod, who don't seem to see a problem, are they just saying that? Because they do see the problem, and they don't want to sound the alarm through the media. You saw it last night in Florida. You saw Vindman, the preferred candidate of Chuck Schumer, spend $9 million against a DSA candidate who spent a tenth of that. And guess what? He lost. This is the battle. I would also suggest, Stuart, that the young people that you were showing before this at the beginning of this segment, remember, they don't have the touchstones that people in my generation have when it comes to socialism. I mean, they're talking about how the older Democrats are out of touch. Is it possible that older Democrats remember Ronald Reagan telling Gorbachev to tear this wall down? Is it possible the older Americans are aware of what happened in Cuba with the Castros? What happened in South America? More recently, what happened in Venezuela? I mean, these are touchstones that this generation does not have. And we've got to do a much better job, Republicans and Democrats, of not only educating, but addressing their concerns.

STUART VARNEY:

Well, House Speaker Mike Johnson, he's predicting that the Republicans will defy history in the midterm elections. Watch this.

SPEAKER MIKE JOHNSON:

We seem to have a problem with that. I'm absolutely convinced we're going to defy the historic trend and keep and grow the House majority for Republicans. The Democrats are in almost an open civil war right now. You see communists actually running for Congress, Marxist are inside the gate. America is not down for that. And I'm so grateful we have common sense on the ballot. This really is a contrast election between common sense candidates like Governor LePage and crazy. And that's what the other side represents.

STUART VARNEY:

I'm sure you have to agree with that, Tom. I do understand that. But why do you think we've got $4 gas? The war drags on. President Trump is personally not that popular. Why do you think history is going to be different this time around with all that in the background?

REP. TOM EMMER:

Well, first off, the House doesn't drive that national message, Stuart. The House is 435 seats. Each seat has its own geography, the way it's drawn, and each piece of geography has unique demographics. What we have learned in the last few cycles on the Republican side is you need the candidate or the incumbent to look and sound, be from the district. And then you need to know what the issue or issues are that actually drive your voters out of the out of the House to vote in November. And you just got to have enough money to get that done. We've been doing this now since the 2018 cycle. Go back to 2018, Trump's first midterm. Do you know, Stuart, that there were over 20 Republicans who are in seats that Hillary Clinton had won in 2016? And if you add up the gross vote totals across the country from that election where we lost 40 seats, the difference was about 120,000 cumulative votes between losing those seats and staying in the majority. So it's already very equally divided in the difference. Mechanically, this is what I'd add to what the speaker said. The map this time, there's over 20 Democrats who are in seats that Donald Trump won. There are only nine Republicans who are in seats that Kamala Harris won, and four of those are in California. We're picking up a seat in Maine. We're picking up a seat in Missouri. We're picking up a seat in Tennessee. We're picking up a seat in Alabama. You just saw last night in Florida, there's going to be gains in Florida. And then forget the map for a second. What Mike didn't talk about is what is the message on the other side? It's just a it's just affordability, but they're doubling down on things that are so unpopular, like gender reassignment surgery for all and the women, men, biological men competing with biological women. These are not mainstream issues. And I'll leave it at this. The top 50 cities, cities, dense urban areas in this country in a nationwide vote account for somewhere under twenty five percent of the total vote.

STUART VARNEY:

OK, but those are the people you're hearing from right now.

REP. TOM EMMER:

That's true. The rest of the country, I believe, is common sense, which is exactly what our speaker is talking about.

STUART VARNEY:

Eighty odd days to go. Tom, Emma, thank you very much for joining us. So hope to see you again soon. Thanks a lot.

REP. TOM EMMER:

Thank you, Stuart.

STUART VARNEY:

You want to check that market because the Dow is now up two hundred and forty points. It had been up more than three hundred a little earlier. The Nasdaq up a hundred points. We've really got to go back to Moderna and Merck stand out today. Their experimental cancer vaccine delivered positive results in its first phase three trial, moving it closer to potential approval. The vaccine, combined with Keytruda, met key goals in more than eleven hundred melanoma patients. That is good news indeed. Mark, come back into this place. We've got we've saved your stock picks until now. Union Pacific.

MARK:

All right. So last week we were talking about me kind of repositioning our investment strategy based on longer term. Eighty dollar plus oil case in point right here. Union Pacific. What we're seeing happening is railroad volume is picking up at the expense of trucks on the highway because diesel prices are high. So revenue was up 12 percent last quarter. We believe that they're going to continue to steal market share from the trucking industry due to higher diesel prices. Furthermore, they've got this pending merger with Norfolk Southern. It was initially blocked by Canadian National. It seems like that's behind them. If that happens, they would be the first coast to coast railroad that would lower cost, drive profitability.

STUART VARNEY:

I like that. That's good stuff. Union Pacific.

MARK:

It is.

STUART VARNEY:

Thank you. NFL commissioner Roger Goodell says at some point there will be NFL teams outside the USA and Tiger Woods. He could soon lose his crown as the PGA Tours all time money winner. Scottie Sheffer is just a million dollars away from him and millions more are up for grabs over the next two weeks. Clay Travis covers it all. He's next. I'm a hustler, baby. Why'd you think they pay me? Let me know.
