HOST:

Joining us now, Congressman Tom Emmer of Minnesota is the House Majority Whip. Great to have you, as always, Congressman. So what do you think Republicans will achieve with this two-day event? We'll be covering it live here on Newsmax.

REP. TOM EMMER:

Well, I think it's genius by Donald Trump, as usual. You've got a media out there, present company excluded, you've got a media out there that wants the public to believe that this is already over. I was telling a group this morning, the genius of this is, while the mainstream media that has Trump derangement syndrome refuses to acknowledge that Republicans are in position to hold their majorities in the House and the Senate, Donald Trump is going to take the message right to the people. He's going to bring, you're going to have 20,000 to 30,000 people here tonight. The energy on the ground for this historic first-time event is palpable. So I'm excited to see what happens tonight when the president takes that stage and we get to hear from the man himself.

HOST:

Yeah, I kind of think that because of the DSA in particular, and the Democrat Party as a whole sort of running scared, I feel like this could be a very big midterm for the Republican Party if the message gets out of what they've done and what they're offering. And I hearken back to the president's, you know, no taxes on tips, things like that. And I'm looking for that key phrase, this go round. What do you think the biggest, you know, advancement has been that resonates with, with almost every American?

REP. TOM EMMER:

Well, first let's, let's hit what you just said. You realize we must have done a great job with the president in passing no taxes on tips because we now have two Democrats, one in Nevada, another one in New York who are claiming they supported no taxes on tips. And every single Democrat voted against the biggest tax cuts in history, including no taxes on overtime, including no taxes on tips, including no tax on financing for your American made vehicle. And the list goes on and on. So you asked me what the most important thing is. Perception has to start to match reality. You saw it at the last couple of days. You had a jobs report that was almost as hot as the weather is down here in Dallas. That was smoking hot numbers three times what anybody was predicting. And when you look at what those numbers were, they're creating good paying benefit type jobs in an era where that just wasn't happening. We need that perception, which is why this convention I think is going to be so useful in giving us a big boost coming out of it towards November 3rd.

HOST:

Yeah, I can hear the music kicking off in back of you there. Very patriotic. We are paying close attention, though, Congressman, to these key primary races. And one that occurred last night was for a Senate seat, one of the biggest Senate battles this November. A New Hampshire Republican, John Sununu, cruised to the nomination, while Democratic Congressman Chris Pappas defended against Democratic Socialist Karishma Manzoor. So setting up a general election showdown that could really help control who is in the Senate. What events do you believe will help Republicans increase turnout specifically in this state? And will this increase the turnout for them? Because that's an important issue going into the midterms. Many are concerned President Trump not being on the ballot will depress the turnout.

REP. TOM EMMER:

Yeah, well, that hasn't been true. I mean, you go back to the gubernatorial candidate in New York. He was elected in 2020 by less than a point a year ago, November, without Donald Trump on the ballot. He was elected by nine points. We are not seeing that. In fact, there's a Harris X poll that was published in a different publication in July that said MAGA Republicans, people identify themselves as MAGA Republicans. These are allegedly the Trump voters that will not show up if he's not on the ballot. Ninety percent of them in that survey said they plan on voting in the midterms. I think you point out a great race in New Hampshire, Sununu is going to win that. But the press on the left is trying to create this imaginary candidate in Pappas who I've served with in the in the U.S. House. And by the way, there is nothing democratic about socialism. We've got to call them what they are. They are not democratic socialists. That is a nonsense term. That's a lot like calling the progressives for the last hundred years when they were already socialist. Guess what, guys? Today, they're communists. And if you don't think their candidates, if they get elected, are going to have to answer to the communists. Well, then you're kidding yourself. That's why vote Republican, save the republic.

HOST:

All right. Hey, Tom, they just all this is what they're going to do if they want to really win. Just bundle your energy and distribute that in every district because that is infectious. Definitely the person for the whip job. And also, you know, enjoy the heat because Minnesota is starting to get a little chilly this time of the year. House Majority Whip Tom Emmer. Thank you for your time.

REP. TOM EMMER:

Thank you, sir.
