REP. TOM EMMER:

House Republicans have passed nearly 900 bills this Congress. You heard our conference chair talk about this. That is the second highest number in United States history. And far too many of these bills have been sent to the Senate where they wait to be considered or just die. A lot of the focus has been on the Save America Act, and rightly so. But that's not the only bill stuck in the Senate. The Clarity Act, which passed this House in July of 2025 with nearly a hundred Democrats voting in support, has yet to move. The United States has an opportunity to cement itself as the global leader in digital asset innovation. We've already seen success, thanks to President Trump's leadership. Our stablecoin legislation, the Genius Act, became law last year. But as our great chairman, French Hill, has stated repeatedly, passing Genius without Clarity is like having a cell phone without cell towers. We need the market structure legislation to provide certainty and predictability for digital assets. By failing to pass a regulatory framework, we're squandering this opportunity that the American people have given us. Until we have clear definitions of what is cash, what is a commodity, and what is a security when it comes to digital assets, American innovation is going to suffer, and our adversaries are going to take advantage. The Senate was sent a good, nonpartisan bill that was supported by members of both parties and a wide coalition of stakeholders. But now, some obstructionist Democrat senators want to make this a partisan issue, changing many crucial pieces of the Clarity Act at the very last second. The American people, make no mistake, they're frustrated with inaction and excuses. The Clarity Act should have been signed into law last year. We'll see what the Senate does this week. Despite our best efforts, the House is not able to legislate on its own. We're going to need them to do something. And with that, I turn it over to our leader, Steve Scalise.
