JOHN:

Tonight is Representative Tom Emmer, good morning Tom, thank you so much for coming on the show this morning.

REP. TOM EMMER:

Hey, good morning John, I thought you were going to break some news on Tim Walz, I understand his next job, he's going to run the Leering Center.

JOHN:

Well, he did try to take credit for those raids yesterday, I had to laugh where as quickly as he posted online that it was because of this joint effort that these raids were taking place via fraud, that Cash Patels quickly went and swatted that down saying, no, you had nothing to do with it.

REP. TOM EMMER:

Yeah, but John, we should pay attention to that because Tim Walz easily could have come out and done one of his I hate cops and especially the federal government's cops. But he didn't do that, John, he came out and tried to take credit, what does he know about what they're about to find? You gotta thank the Department of Justice and Homeland Security for finally, I mean, they've really taken action against these Somali fraudsters. More than 20 sites, as you know, were raided yesterday, including the infamous Quality Leering Center. And Tim Walz and Keith Ellison are trying to claim credit, as you point out, but both of these guys did absolutely nothing. The only thing Tim Walz and Ellison should be taking credit for, John, is the $9 billion worth of fraud they've uncovered that they had stolen under their watch in the last seven and a half years.

JOHN:

There is quite a bit of movement going on right now. We had the indictment of Comey yesterday, there was a former Fauci advisor that was indicted. It seems as if the acting Attorney General Todd Blanche, along with the FBI Director Kash Patel, they're moving swiftly on a number of different issues, including these raids yesterday. Is there any correlation in your mind between Pam Bondi stepping down as acting AG and then Todd Blanche taking over in the interim, at least for now, of Attorney General? And then all this movement we see going forward in terms of these indictments and these investigations, Tom?

REP. TOM EMMER:

No, I can't comment on whether they're related, cuz I don't know that they are, John. The indictments, for instance, the former Fauci assistant and Comey, couldn't have happened to a better guy. I wonder if he'll find some more shells on the seashore someday. Those were grand jury indictments, and this is important for people to understand. These are citizens that are randomly selected, and they serve on a grand jury, and the government and the other side make their presentations of their case. The government, I guess, makes the presentation of their case. And if the grand jury, which is kind of like a pre-jury to a criminal jury, if they find enough cause for the indictment, they will issue that result. And that is what Todd Blanche and company are using as they move forward now with criminal prosecutions. So this isn't, for instance, Donald Trump or someone in his administration pointing at James Comey and saying, I want you to prosecute this guy. This is real evidence that was presented to real Americans who said, you know what? There's enough evidence here that it appears he committed a crime or crimes. And the reason I don't know that it's related to the Pambani thing is because that takes some time, John. That isn't just an overnight process.

JOHN:

What are your thoughts, though? I mean, overall, when it comes to this indictment of Comey, I've seen some commentary. I talked about this extensively in the first hour of the show. Just so you know, Tom, I'm very much in support of this. We need to reestablish, in my opinion. The moral guardrails that we used to accept here in the country, you just don't threaten the president. And I know there's some hemming and hawing over what exactly this was in terms of a threat. But I'm in support of this indictment moving forward because people need to be held accountable. But I'm curious, your thoughts on just how important this indictment over this particular issue of 8647 and his social media post is.

REP. TOM EMMER:

Yeah, well, look, this is the one thing that I hear more than anything else from people every single day. Every single day they ask me, when is someone finally going to be held accountable for all of this criminal activity? People are sick and tired of elected officials or even appointed people having a double standard and being treated differently from ordinary people. James Comey was operating, he was responsible for the most corrupt FBI in my lifetime. I'm sure there were issues at other times, but these guys literally weaponized the FBI against a candidate for the presidency. They literally, one of their attorneys who presented to the FISA court was convicted of lying to the court when he got a warrant to surveil Carter Page while he was engaged with the Trump's first campaign. These guys are bad dudes. They used our government for their benefit and they used it against American citizens. And I think James Comey is just the tip of the iceberg because you look at what Jack Smith was doing. I hope that grand jury is busy at work right now as we speak.

JOHN:

We know that, we talked about this last week, talking with Representative Tom Emmer regarding the deceptively worded referendum and the redistricting in Virginia. Yesterday, the Virginia Supreme Court as it moves through this process, refused to keep in place the pause of the lower court on the redistricting referendum. Now it's my understanding that that means that the current districts in Virginia will stand leading into the midterms while this works through. Is that accurate or could this still be challenged and changed by the Virginia Supreme Court and this redistricting occur before the midterms?

REP. TOM EMMER:

Yeah, I mean, right now it's too soon to declare victory. I mean, it certainly helped that the vote was so close in the end. But you've got four cases actually pending, Tazewell 1, Tazewell 2, there's one in Fairfax County and I forget where the other one is. There are four points in the Tazewell 1 decision that is the, that's the TRO that you're talking about that is in place currently. It was issued the day after the vote. I'm told that of those four, the petitioners only have to succeed on one. And that is likely to happen if the court actually applies the law as it exists to the facts that they have. What happened yesterday, you are correct. The higher court refused to remove that stay or lift that stay. Yes, that is a victory, but it could be short lived if they come back. Because we don't know if they were just doing a judicial courtesy to the lower court. Because as one of the Virginia members was explaining to me this morning, one of the justices had a spouse pass away over the weekend and was literally in the bench on Monday. So this might just be a temporary delay. Assuming though that it continues, John, the districts as they exist right now will be the districts for the midterms.

JOHN:

Okay, all right. And that's good news moving forward. But I have to, as you imagine, I know that you had some concern last week, as I think we all we all did, if this redistricting had gone through prior to the midterms, correct?

REP. TOM EMMER:

Well, yes, and it's so crooked what they did. I mean, the language is just the tip of the iceberg. I think if you look at the Tazewell case, I think they violated their own law and constitution at least six times in pushing forward with this thing. And keep in mind, their governor got elected much the way Tim Walz did. Her name is Abigail Spanberger, who served with Tim Walz. She ran as a moderate, and the day that she got elected, she showed everybody that she's actually Tim Walz in a dress. So that has had a major impact on Virginia, which is kind of a left of center, right of center state that goes both ways every several years. She really turned a lot of people off, and I think that's why you saw that vote almost go in Republicans' favor. A little bit more time, and I think people would have understood just how crooked this thing was. And you know what, John? The good news is, regardless of party, the vast number of Americans still believe in fairness and justice.

JOHN:

Well, speaking of time, we are out of time this morning, Representative Tom Emmer. But I do appreciate the opportunity to speak with you again, and I look forward to talking again next week.

REP. TOM EMMER:

You're the best, John. Talk to you soon.

JOHN:

Thanks, Tom.
